

This is mostly just going to be a scattered jot-down of my thoughts throughout the situation.

The situation for the past few years has taught me a lot about how to grow from what I did. It's no secret I was a bad person with what I did, and nothing I do now will change that. But unfortunately what it means is that no one will take whatever I say at face value. People's opinions will forever be tainted by what I have done so it's hard for anyone to take me seriously or without any grain of salt. It is not my job to change the way people think about me, because I should not change my ways on how others view me. This isn't to say that I shouldn't get better, I have been getting better and have recently scheduled an appointment with a psychiatrist so hopefully I can get medication, but there's only so much I can do to make up for my actions of the past.

A lot of people have been telling me to apologize to the victims of my actions. What not a lot of people know is that the reason why I've been mostly avoiding that is because the victims themselves have told me to not talk to them, as even the general idea of me hurts their emotional healing process and applies way too much stress on them.

Nothing I can do today can make up for the actions I have done to the victims of the situation, not from Databrawl, not from PixelBit or BlushCrunch and wherever else I have hurt people. It doesn't matter what I do, whether it be an apology or a theoretical million dollars, sometimes you just can't heal what you have broken with someone. They are human too, and what I have done has permanently broken what I had with these people and they choose not to forgive me even with my apologies. It is my burden to carry and it weighs on my mind a lot, but now the only thing I can do is to continue improving my mental health and moving on. For those who need to hear it though, I wish there were more ways for me to say I'm sorry. I should've just made good choices from the beginning but now I must live with my mistakes. I hope the victims involved are able to heal and move on from this situation in the future.

In response to those who think I am comparing myself to the other victims in the situation, I am not. I wouldn't consider myself a victim especially considering the things Qwel has done to others. My point was even though I have done bad things, Qwel lied to me about how she truly felt about me and lied to everyone about how I acted when complying with her after my firing. Does that make me a victim? No. Does that make my experience with her comparable to the ones experienced by the others? Absolutely not. I am unsure where the notion that my situation is comparable to the pain of others came from. The thread was to overall support the fact that Qwel is untrustworthy, as others have been saying. That the victims are not lying to you, not that I am a victim myself.

Whatever I do unfortunately will not be enough for a lot of people. It's something I've been struggling to come to terms with and simply I have to accept that. I understand since I had lied before, it takes a grain of salt to believe whatever I say now since 'if he lied, what's stopping him from doing it again?'. It is a valid point and one that has made it hard to try and convey how much I've changed. The situation and the guilt I felt throughout the years has taught me humility and it hurts me how much things would be better if I was honest from the beginning. Lying doesn't help anything, it just delays the heartbreak. It doesn't benefit me whatsoever to lie in the current day, so why should I? To dig a deeper hole for myself when I'm trying to get out of it? That isn't to say however that I'm 'forcing' you to believe me, just saying that at this point I have no reason to lie about anything. I've already lost pretty much everything that meant so much to me so what more can I lose?

There has been a lot of hurtful comments that ignore whatever I post whether it be the thing I posted yesterday or earlier this year, like "ok but youre a pedophile die" or "go to hell and rot" and I feel they're completely disingenuous and cynical in my process of healing and improvement. I know some of these are coming from bots or trolls but a lot of them are from genuine people who hate my guts. Like it's warranted but the fact there's people who want me to die because of what I did is genuinely harrowing. For the longest time I was in the lowest slumps of my life because I felt like the most hated person on Earth. It took having my fiancé in my life and the few people I had talked to here and there for me to gain even an ounce of confidence. I'm still not there yet and I think it's gonna take medication cause all of this fucked me up BAD. I'm not saying that you can't have an opinion on someone, but what you say to them can have major consequences on their health. No matter how big a stone is when it's thrown into the ocean, it can travel deep.

To the people who believe that I posted what I did as a means to weasel back into the community, I am nothing but confused. First off, no, I don't ever want to go back to Qwel with how she treated me and others. Second off, I hope you don't actually believe I think I have the ability to go back in with my track record? Not to get rather informal here but are you serious? I am painfully aware of what I've done and have accepted I'm not coming back. I posted Dandy's World stuff earlier in the year, yes, but that's because I care about the project. Not because I want to be hired again or get back into the community's good graces by making shiny new renders or animations. It's just for love of the craft, to keep my skills honed and to improve my animation/modeling skills. I stopped posting them not only because I was advised to so people don't engage with my content and thus get in trouble, but also to step away and improve myself offline.

I may add to this as I find more things within myself to talk about, or make a new document entirely. To end it off, I've been a bad person no one can deny that. But you can't deny that I'm doing my best to make progress moving forward and will keep doing so. Until something comes up again though I will mostly remain offline to take care of my personal life as it's been pretty hectic all things considered.

I don't care if you don't care about me or if you don't agree with what I post, as that's not my call to make. Everyone is so quick to hurt other people just because they believe in what I have to say. Getting upset at people defending me is one thing, but putting people down for just wishing me well or general conversation is just sad. I wish I could do something about it but I just can't and it eats at me. I am a person too, I can't just 'not exist' because some people who despise me want to bring down others because they want to believe in the words I speak. That being said, nothing should downplay the victims' experiences at hand and they need all the support they can get. There's only so many things I can say so many times before I start repeating myself, I've said all I could to make peace with the situation other than what I provided earlier. Otherwise I look forward to continuing my path of self improvement.